A Lexicon of Evil Bastards—And Deniers Of Information

It's the chicken and egg thing, what came first? And can't you have one without the other. It's incomprehensible what Trump is doing to the US and to the world, but so far he's not dragging the American public along by force, so what is allowing for this madness?

What comes to mind is when a plague of locusts called the Rajneesh, devotees of the Bhagwan, descended on my town, Ashland, Oregon, in the 1980s. Some I had known for years, gave up all their worldly possessions, to dress in pink/purple, and work 7 days a week, for the promise of free sex and a supposed connectivity with the divine.

Those of us who followed what happened know that it ended in misery and depravity—maybe those kind of things always do. In a like manner, Americans who now identify with either the right or the left are analogous to Rajneesh, having traded their ability to question—for what?

Trump, like Netanyahu, would destroy this nation to win the next election. Maybe there could be some solace, if the democrats unseating Trump wouldn't be making decisions from the same playbook, but with one small change—trading fascism for communism.

No matter which party is in power, unless Americans wake up and ask difficult questions of themselves, we will find ourselves in a world that's given way to globalist/tokenization/corporatism—with executive power that obliterates not only the courts and legislators (already bought off), but the Constitution and Bill of Rights—along with anything that resembles liberty.

Is Trump a force for good? No, he's not, but he is a force. And though not as apparent as it soon will be, he is becoming increasing desperate. As America's oil reserve runs out and the midterms approach, unless the body politic is even more stupid than I assume, Trump could be in for a major reversal. Because Trump cannot abide with loss without being able to place the blame on someone else, Americans face a grave threat.

This morning the ante's been raised with Trump retreating from the war with Iran. Of course this might be another ruse, but if not, this shows desperation—given a US mission/foreign policy built around global dominance.

If it is a ruse, and Iran sinks a US Navy ship (a possibility), Trump could be psychologically trapped with what remains for him, nuclear retaliation, in this is, the only time in the nuclear age when the likes of Trump/Netanyahu, and some EU/British fools, have collective fingers on the nuclear button. Netanyahu would push it for sure. Trump's an unknown—so he might do it?

And there's nobody around him capable of standing up to him. I used to think that Musk might be something of a voice of reason, but he is not. Like Tulsi Gabbard, he retreated from his alignment with Trump, but being the money grubber he is, he slunk back in. Maybe the gods understand, causing him to lose 3/4s of trillion dollars over a few months. Beyond that, think on Musk using StarLink to defeat Iran/Russia—the wrong side of history.

In a global economic struggle between China and Musk—Musk loses. Boutique, expensive Teslas remain viable only as long as Chinese cars are sanctioned out of the US market. When Chinese low-cost chips and low cost/free Chinese AI finds its way into the US markets, it's over for the $.

The only positive in our economic defeat to China is if Trump understands that a superpower, defeated by Iran, had best not attack China.

Trump plays the bait and switch—but not all that well. Consider his confrontation with the Smithsonian over there being no American founder's exhibits. That would be a plus for Trump, except he gave away our constitutional rights to the State of Israel. For those who rightfully accused Obama as not being aligned with America, know that Trump aligns himself with technocrats/global corporatists, and willingly aligns himself with powerful global nationalists who support his takeover over the world.

Trump's tariff, price inflation has not surfaced to the degree many anticipated. But with Trump presenting lies as truth, it's too early to judge outcomes. Why do I say that? I'm of the opinion that history's most indebted (unproductive), nation, with morons for leaders, will not, in the end, win-out.

Instead, when the ledger gets balanced, the US will suffer a similar fate to the EU. What is that? Not that long ago, the EU (fine toolmaker to the world,) was denied inexpensive Russian energy, and that initiated its slide into becoming a non-productive continent—unable to complete.

As a result of losing inexpensive Russian energy (when the US allegedly blew-up NordStream 2), Europe is forced to buy expensive US LNG. Consequently, the EU loses 15K jobs each quarter and its citizens have to decide between having heat or food. We don't hear about it on the networks.

We are told that Trump needs Greenland to quell threats from Russia and China. Why? Russia/China might open a global passage not controlled by the US Navy. Trump says the US would be grateful if his proposal regarding Greenland were accepted, but he would remember a refusal. This vindictive man is leading the United States? He threatens sanctions on Canada for bad wildfire management while the Western States burn. Oregon has the most charred acres in its history because all of our dollars are dropped on Gaza and Tehran. How many days of non-global military intervention would it take to turn all of America's forests into fire-safe parks?

Using logic to weigh the facts, I'm not here to entertain, but to inform—which accounts for some of you seeing me as a gloom and doom mentality. Others, incapable of seeing Trump got who he is, simply deride me. But, the situation in which we find ourselves doesn't present alternatives for hopeful outcomes. As for American citizens stepping up, contrast our quiet streets with the Vietnam protests/marches at the end of the 1960s.

If Trump can take over the world using rhetoric that only morons buy-into, then it's a done deal. When Trump tells us that Greenland is US territory (as he does with Venezuelan), if he can sell that—it's another done deal.

I take issue, somewhat, with the notion that our situation is caused by Trump's mental faculties being compromised. That's likely part of it, but mostly he's trapped by a lack of maneuverability to take control of the world.

For me, this is the most terrifying period of my lifetime. How it is that the republic became subjected to the trans agenda, the DEI agenda, the Israeli agenda, suppressed news networks agenda, useless legislators and judges agenda. It's all incomprehensible to me. Worst of all, it happened faster than I might could imagined. So what do we do to maintain our equilibrium?

Getting out of the US might work for some—not me—this is where I live. Getting more gold/silver/lead/food might help, but it's no guarantee. For me, recalling the many decades of near sanity I've experienced and my love of the Constitution/Bill of Rights that made it possible—maybe that's enough?
