It's All the Same War

Not only is the war in Ukraine, the same war as the war in Iran, but also the wars in Lebanon, Yemen, Gaza and the West Bank, along with past wars in Syria and Libya. And being part of the same war applies to projected, planned-for wars pitting the EU against Russia and the US against China.

Each of these wars has a mission to sustain US/Israeli hegemony, and are either linked to Trump's mafioso tactics, Bibi's inhumanity, or a leftist blueprint to degrade/sell-out the US to globalists, using trans politics, unbounded illegal immigration, mRNA, and Diversity/EQUITY/Inclusion—DEI being a plot to emasculate Americans using divide/conquer.

To the untrained eye so many disparate element can't possibly attach to a single mission, but to anyone researching facts—it's obvious. Not only what I've identified, but what's happened to gold/silver belongs under the same umbrella. Connections amongst the above list come clear with time, but the gold/silver phenomena requires an explanation.

A couple of things: gold and silver, having risen vehemently, merit a downward repricing. Then again, silver's first rise to $50 was almost a half century ago, and $50 then, considering inflation—is more like $10 now.

Given that central banks are ongoing buyers of precious metals and nations are re-patriating gold and listing silver as a strategic metal, while hedge funds re-apportion a 20% allotment for precious metals, a 58% drop in silver pricing, and a $1600 gold drop is suspect—begging the question?

Assume 8 traders of gold/silver control the paper price of precious metals, all of them banks. These entities, for more than a quarter century, took economic control by setting the prices for 4 precious metals, oil, and copper. For 25 years, that's all they needed to control precious metal prices.

How does it work? The 8 major players buy massive amounts of short contracts (on margin), during low traffic times. This floods the market, overwhelming buy orders, driving price down. When desired price is reached, and shorts made whole, they cease buying short contracts. Because major players are the only ones with means to short, the price of metal rises for no other reason than the players stop shorting. If they do nothing, prices can rise dramatically. With this tactic, prices rise and the process repeats, resulting in controlled-price precious metals. Until now, that's how it used to work.

Because this is a charade (bound to fail), there comes a time when the process no longer works. With silver well over $100, and insufficient longs to cover the shorts, silver was set to go ballistic, ushering in another Lehman moment. By way of consequence, putting 8 major banks on the chop block.

Instead, longs came in. From where it's difficult to determine. My surmise is the really big boys (maybe even the government), friends of the shorts, using other people's money, with little concern whether they get caught in a $T debt trap. It doesn't matter because it not their money, and they'll be made whole by the big banks who make a fortune on shorts.

Everything in the economic/political jigsaw puzzle fits together. The world knows the dollar and most fiat is on life-support—gold is the coin of the realm. But for now, using shenanigans, just like Trump selling the idea that he rules the world, gold and silver can be knocked back just long enough for Trump/Netanyahu to decimate a few more nations, plunder their gold, and take control of their energy. For tyrants—it's worth the risk.

Is this over? It is not. With gold down $160, and silver down $65, the shorts should all be settled and the process reset. But strangely, the number of short contracts on Comex is reduced by a minuscule amount. Does this anticipate a further bloodbath? Adding to the confusion, there are a huge number of calls for silver to close beyond its high before the end of 2026. Would monied interests make those bets without being forewarned?

My last article: 'The Bill of Rights—Our last Ditch Defense', required readers to: oppose the politics behind the trans movement, understand that neither political party supports the Constitution/Bill of Rights, recognize the 2nd Amendment as our means to take back the republic, see the US as a terrorist nation doing the bidding of a genocidal Netanyahu, and recognize that Russia/China/Iran/Yemen, each require a comprehensive security agreement wherein sovereignty is recognized. Lastly, to understand that without nuclear weapons, US hegemony has a limited future. And, given the realities, the West needs Russia more than Russia needs the West.

The stakes in the game are not recognized in the West. Americans/Europeans do not see the blight on the world the West brings—measured by Israeli voter's mindset (even with Arab voters), giving a majority of seats to Netanyahu. Will Trump, post midterms, continue to do Bibi's bidding?

How can VP Vance, when responding to questions of failure of leadership from loved ones of US service members killed in the Middle East war be so out of touch? He told them he hadn't heard about it—this is all news to him.

My title for this article tells the story. It's all the same war. Whatever is going on with Venezuela, Cuba, Ukraine, Yemen, and Iran comes from the same playbook. Each justifies a mission assuring persistent US hegemony, using Trump's mafioso tactics of stealing the sweat equity of others. For that mission Iran/Russia/China stand in the way.

For political expediency, we see a terrified Trump coming down on Zelensky for attacking Russian energy facilities—and a willingness on Trump's part to allow Russian oil (at least until the midterms are over), back into the global market. Trump's view reflects the sentiment on the right that Russia is not nearly the problem that are Iran and China.

Across the aisle, Obama has shown up to identify the Strait of Hormuz (and therein Trump), as the problem. Obama needs to be steadfast in his support of the Ukraine horror show because the left hates Russia—every bit (and more), than does the right.

Neither US political party cares a whit for humanity. Trump can murder Cubans/Venezuelans/Iranians at will while Obama speaks in favor of Ukraine's struggle (down to the last Ukrainian), to somehow produce a miracle—wherein Russia will be wrought asunder.

The situation is hopeless—and hope deals us a disservice. Hope is waiting for someone else to do it. We have a Bill of Rights with which citizens are mandated to take charge. If we lose the republic—we will have failed.

If a small, destroyed nation, Yemen, can overcome the treachery that is Saudi Arabia/US, and a besieged nation, Iran, can reset the entire Middle East, why can't we Americans take back our republic from insane tyrants?

To turn this mess around, get back to the Constitution and Bill of Rights will involve the same risk as was Valley forge. Do we get it: once our liberty is taken from us—AI tech assures it won't come back? Please comment.
