That Dollar In Your Wallet

If you have a dollar in your wallet, you are among the few that even bother with currency you can touch. But, by default, we are each among those whose lives are tied to the dollar—which is fast becoming worthless. Worse yet, dollars are the official coin of the realm.

Dollars are not the legal coin of the realm—that designation belongs to gold/silver coinage—real money. Paper (fiat), dollars are an instrument of credit expansion (counterfeiting), used to enforce US hegemony—globally.

A gold standard is the only viable means to regulate markets. Yeah, I know: gold standards don't work. But why? Because human nature does not play inside the lines. As soon as a gold standard is put in place, great effort gets made to circumvent it for economic adventurism—and to get rid of it.

What's irking me today is a need I have for cash to pay for improvements I'm making on my home and rentals. This is the first year I had to borrow $20K to pay my property taxes, which I borrowed because of corrupt government taxation that I refuse to abide by.

Gold and silver are the only real constitutional money, and appreciation on either is taxed at 28%—with a reporting requirement. Worse than that—any gold/silver held less than a year can be taxed up to 37%. Conversely, capital gains on stocks begins at 15%, demonstrating that elites want us in the stock market and out of real money—gold.

We are being taxed for holding real, legal money. But, if we borrow against gold and silver, there is no transfer—therefore no tax. And with the expectation for this entire economic charade to come down, elites are undermining gold/silver—pedal to the metal.

You know the saying: Markets can remain irrational, longer than you can remain solvent. Considering the government run-up to $43T of debt, that statement proves true. But it's also true that economic irrationality (like the battery in an electric car), has a wear date—that is somewhere set in stone.

Given that gold/silver are the actual measure of all things economic, the w*ear date* for the dollar is now approaching at a precipitous rate, and no one invested in precious metals wants to sell prior to the credit and dollar collapse. Hence, I'm borrowing.

I have a year to pay back what I borrowed for property taxes, at negligible interest, and I intend to borrow more for renovations on rentals. Also, there's a motorbike on Christie's I want to get at the end of the month (I'm only 82 and driving Manhattan from Oregon to get it sounds like fun). As long as I have assets to cover what I borrow—I'm feeling secure.

But what will happen to those without gold/silver when that dollar in your wallet no longer spends. Is that coming soon? Have you been watching the Chinese yuan making its way into Canada, and most every nation? Having yourbeen watching the accelerated selling of US bonds? US bonds are what backs the dollar.

Americans are economically besieged from all sides—leaving us with one alternative. We have to outmaneuver the besiegers. As with avoiding taxes while not evading taxes, we need workarounds of the system. For instance, I've applied for loans 6/21 months, no interest. Americans without assets take loans because they have no alternative. Loan companies are counting on: if you can't pay now, how will you be able to pay in 6 months?

Because of who I am, I'm exposed in my role of constitution patriot—which I won't abandon out of fear of government. My articles put me in the line of fire, by default. But, economically, if I see a workaround, I take it.

Elites are responsible for citizens becoming pirates—to avoid an illegal system. This pits us against economic/political elites—where, out of necessity for survival, we resort back to primordial roots—and pirate instincts.

I admit to making a bet here. Because I don't want to sell precious metal now, I put it off a year, betting this thing comes apart before the end of 2027. But, I'm not betting everything—only creating a necessity that I will have to sell or borrow when it's needed.

I could almost care less. This last 6 months, working hard every day, has done wonders for my psyche and my properties (my wife appreciates what we've done to the house). And, I feel young again. I can do my pushups and I can drive to Manhattan.

You know what they say about the body: use it or lose it. Well it's the same for the soul. And nothing is better for your soul than telling illegal authority to 'piss off'. Of course, we have to be careful how we do it. The cop who pulls you over might turn into the worst day of your life. Or, the FBI at your door asking whether your writing is hate speech. Or Zionism prevails across the US, and truth told becomes anti-Semitic—criminality.

Maybe it's the hard work and my new lease on life, but part of me is looking forward to this thing coming down. I know it will be bad for so many (including me), but it's coming anyway. So, I'll keep on finding ways to stay solvent until elite irrationality comes apart. Why not accept a coming reality where soon, we'll be asked to lay it on the line for freedom and liberty.

Consider what happens when the dollar fails—and it will. If it goes down gradually that's the boiling frog syndrome, where over 6 months our economy drops below Mexico's standards, and over the next 6 months, America comes to resemble a central African nation.

Or, when the dollar gets past a tipping point, it falls abjectly. What does that look like? Nothing that any of us want to see. Like Hemingway's bankruptcy—it happens slowly at first. But all those nations/entities holding our bonds, they scramble for redemption, which for most holders will not be there. It's that musical chairs thing with 10 chairs for 1000 scrambling—played out on the deck of the Titanic an hour before she goes down.

Something else. When elites see the jig is up, they have one card to play—martial law. So, in a crisis where Americans have no currency that has value, and no hope for an alternative currency (the elites won't have prepared), and are trying to feed their families—those entrusted to protect Americans will instead take measures to take control us/suppress rebellion.

If you have nothing to trade, you don't eat. Think on the Great Depression, but not with 25% unemployment, more like 75%. If you have nothing to trade, your existence is at risk. If, you have metals, you need to take care. But, even with the risk of owning silver—it's better to have bought silver.

PS: I'm not as angry as I used to be. Coming to terms with human nature, has instead made me sad—wistful? Our founders saw human nature as flawed and created a government around that assumption. But flawed Americans are doing their damndest to rid us of what works. What underlies anger and how it functions in our citizenry/government—my next article.
